Stan Tatkin, PsyD, MFTIntroduction to a Psychobiological Approach to Couple Therapy (PACT)

Monday - Friday: 9:00a.m. - 12:30p.m. EDT | 30-Minute Break Daily
15-Hour Course | Delivery Format: In-Person or Live-Online

A psychobiological approach to couple therapy (PACT) is, at its core, a social-justice, purpose-centered approach to primary attachment relationships (two or more). That is to say, PACT therapists expect their partnership clients to become secure functioning. A secure-functioning system is one that is a two (or more) psychological system grounded in fairness, justice, mutual sensitivity, collaboration, and cooperation. In other words, a secure functioning relationship is a team sport. For many, secure functioning is a high bar to achieve. It requires a degree of social-emotional development, moral reasoning, individuation, differentiation, self-activation, and, of course, interest in, and a willingness to pursue it as a goal.

PACT, underneath the hood, is a polytheoretical approach that combines, among other things, attachment, arousal regulation, and developmental neuroscience. Aside from the top-down therapeutic stance of secure functioning, PACT is a bottom-up approach that focuses on implicit, somatic "tells" in each partner's face, body, voice, movements, and linguistic choices, particularly when partners are under stress. This process orientation helps the clinician obtain more information quickly and strategically than content-oriented or procedure-based approaches.
